

Roadmap for frontline professionals interacting with male perpetrators of domestic violence and abuse

TO ENSURE A COORDINATED MULTI-AGENCY RESPONSE TO PERPETRATORS

With financial support from the Rights, Equality and Citizenship Programme of the European Union

ENGAGE Roadmap for frontline professionals interacting with male perpetrators of domestic violence and abuse to ensure a coordinated multi-agency response to perpetrators

Editor: Heinrich Geldschläger (ENGAGE project coordinator)

Contributors: Alvaro Ponce, Ana Duarte (Spain), Mathilde Sengoelge, Marc Nectoux, Elisabeth Perry (France), Alessandra Pauncz, Stella Cutini, Giacomo Grifoni, Giovanni Billi (Italy), and Ralf Puchert, Dietlind Schröder, European Network for the Work with Perpetrators of domestic violence (WWP EN)

Year of publication: 2019

Graphic design: Monika Medvey

Cover image: istock.com

European project REC-VAW-2016/776919 – ENGAGE frontline professionals to provide a coordinated multi-agency response to perpetrators.

Co-funded by:

With financial support
from the Rights, Equality and Citizenship Programme
of the European Union

This publication has been produced with the financial support of the Rights, Equality and Citizenship Programme of the European Union for the project REC-VAW-AG-2016/776919. The contents of this publication are the sole responsibility of the project partners and can in no way be taken to reflect the views of the European Commission.

Centro
di Ascolto

Uomini
Maltrattanti
ONLUS

COMUNE
DI FIRENZE

TERRES
VIVRE

WWP
EUROPEAN NETWORK

Roadmap for frontline professionals interacting with male perpetrators of domestic violence and abuse
to ensure a coordinated multi-agency response to perpetrators

Table of Contents

---

4	About this Roadmap
8	Power, control and the consequences of violence and abuse
9	Ensuring accountability and victim safety
11	Beliefs and positions towards men who use domestic violence and abuse
13	Flowchart of 4 Steps for engaging perpetrators
14	Step 1: Identifying domestic violence and abuse in men – signs and indicators
16	Step 2: Asking men about domestic violence and abuse
21	Step 3: Motivating perpetrators for referral
22	Step 4: Referring men to perpetrator programmes, coordinated multi-agency response
25	Ethical, professional (deontological) and legal dilemmas
27	In a nutshell: Twelve do's and don'ts when engaging with a perpetrator
28	References
29	Annex of tools and resources

---

About this Roadmap

In Europe, over one in five women (22 %) have experienced physical and/or sexual violence and 43 % of women have experienced some form of psychological violence from either a current or previous partner<sup>1</sup>. Domestic violence and abuse against intimate partners has a devastating impact on the health and well-being of the victims, with long term negative consequences for all involved (including the perpetrator). Adequate measures to protect victims are essential, yet a comprehensive policy to tackle this kind of violence must also address the perpetrators. The Council of Europe Convention on preventing and combating violence against women and domestic violence (Istanbul Convention) requires European Union Member States to invest in programmes for domestic violence perpetrators and for sex offenders (Article 16, Hester and Lilley, 2014).

Why a roadmap?

The roadmap is to assist frontline professionals in health care or social services, child protection services, police, and others, coming into contact with male service users who are violent or abusive to their female partners -- as these represent the majority of cases<sup>2</sup>. One of the most common requests from victims is for someone to work with their partner, to help him change and to keep them and their children safe from violence. Working with these men to change their behaviour is a key step towards preventing domestic violence.

How was it made?

The contents of the roadmap are based on a review of the relevant literature and input from frontline professionals, male perpetrators and experts working with perpetrators who agreed to take part in focus groups or interviews in three European countries (France, Italy, Spain) as part of the ENGAGE project. Additional experts in the field from three other European countries (Austria, Croatia and Finland) as well as Prof. Marianne Hester (University of Bristol) and Neil Blacklock (Respect, UK) as members of the advisory board for the ENGAGE project also provided valuable feedback for this guide. All frontline professionals interviewed stated their need for tools to better address violent behaviour in men.

Who is it for?

The roadmap is designed for frontline professionals who may come into contact with violent or abusive men. There are three ways this may happen:

- Men as service users: some men may disclose their abusive behaviour and ask for help, others will present themselves as victims of their (female) partner's violence, but most will not refer to the abuse while, at most, presenting with possibly related issues such as alcohol, stress, depression, and relationship problems,
- Men as partners of service users: some men insist on accompanying their partners to appointments and/or talk for their partners (they may appear to be caring and protective of their partners and very plausible),
- Men as fathers of young service users: in your role you may know children affected by domestic violence, and consequently the perpetrator, with whom you may be in contact in your agency, in his home or at child protection case conferences, for example.

Your response to any disclosure, however indirect, could be significant for encouraging responsibility and motivating men towards change. It is paramount to keep in mind that the primary goal of all work with male perpetrators (including identification and referral) is to ensure the safety of women and children.

---

1 European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (2014)

2 Although there are also cases of domestic violence and abuse from women to their male partners and in lesbian, gay, bisexual, transsexual, xx (LGBTI+) relationships, this roadmap focuses on men using violence and abuse against their female partners because these are the most frequent cases and, consequently, most of the knowledge base of scientific evidence and practical experience is related to these kinds of cases.

What role do frontline professionals have when interacting with male perpetrators?

Frontline professionals have a responsibility to deliver the following related to interaction with (potential) male perpetrators:

- Identify signs of the use of domestic violence in male service user's discourse and behaviour,
- Address the issue with them in a respectful and direct way,
- Give clear, unequivocal messages about violence and its consequences,
- Encourage and motivate perpetrators to get professional, specialised help from perpetrator programmes and to stop their abusive behaviours,
- Make referrals to / provide information and contact details about available perpetrator programmes,
- Make sure women and children victims/survivors receive adequate support and safety planning,
- Work in collaboration with other relevant services within an integrated approach to hold the man accountable for his behaviour.

As a frontline professional you are not responsible for:

- ✗ providing specialist services such as long-term counselling to help men stop their violence/abuse,
- ✗ identifying the processes that led to the violent behaviour or to explore non-abusive alternatives.

These are the responsibility of experts working in perpetrators programmes who are specifically trained and have extensive experience in the work with perpetrators.

“As a professional it is hard to get past the denial and lack of acknowledgement of the partner violence by the perpetrator and or the victim”

(ENGAGE focus group, frontline professional)

In your interaction with male perpetrators you should:

- affirm that their violent behaviour is a choice and that they can choose to stop,
- be respectful and empathic but clearly state that violence is unacceptable and that many behaviours are against the law,
- make it clear that there are no excuses for the violence.

Through this Roadmap you will be able to strengthen your knowledge and skills and to gain confidence to more effectively identify, address and refer male perpetrators to a perpetrator programme and other specialist services.

TERMINOLOGY

For the purposes of this document:

“frontline professional” refers to a service provider who is in direct contact with male service users, such as workers in health care or social services, child protection services, police, or others.

“perpetrator” is used to describe men who use violent and abusive behaviour against their partner or former partner, whether or not they have been charged, prosecuted or convicted.

Men of any race, age, religion, socioeconomic background, education level or relationship status (married, living together, dating, divorced, separated, etc.) can be(come) a perpetrator.

Partner violence includes behaviours that physically harm, arouse fear, prevent a partner from doing what they wish or force them to behave in ways they do not want. It includes the use of physical and sexual violence, threats and intimidation, emotional abuse and economic deprivation.

Many of these different forms of domestic violence/abuse can be occurring at any one time within the same intimate relationship.

Domestic violence and abuse, gender-based violence and violence against women

The framework for this roadmap is provided by the definitions and regulations set out in the Istanbul Convention<sup>3</sup>, the EU Victims’ Directive<sup>4</sup> and the Guidelines for standards in the Work with Perpetrators developed by WWP EN<sup>5</sup>.

Within this framework, violence against women is understood as a historical societal problem that requires an integrated multilevel approach addressing all stakeholders involved. The Istanbul Convention defines violence against women as:

“A violation of human rights and a form of discrimination against women and shall mean all acts of gender-based violence that result in, or are likely to result in, physical, sexual, psychological or economic harm or suffering to women, including threats of such acts, coercion or arbitrary deprivation of liberty, whether occurring in public or in private life” (Article 3a).

Furthermore, the Convention defines domestic violence as “all acts of physical, sexual, psychological or economic violence that occur within the family or domestic unit or between former or current spouses or partners, whether or not the perpetrator shares or has shared the same residence with the victim” (Article 3b).

Perpetrator programmes

With regard to work with perpetrators, Article 16 of the Istanbul Convention, on “Preventive intervention and treatment programmes”, states that:

1. Parties shall take the necessary legislative or other measures to set up or support programmes aimed at teaching perpetrators of domestic violence to adopt non-violent behaviour in interpersonal relationships with a view to preventing further violence and changing violent behavioural patterns.

3 The Council of Europe Convention on preventing and combating violence against women and domestic violence (<https://www.coe.int/en/web/istanbul-convention/home>)

4 Directive 2012/29/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 25 October 2012 establishing minimum standards on the rights, support and protection of victims of crime (<https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=celex%3A32012L0029>)

5 Guidelines to develop standards for programmes working with perpetrators of domestic violence (<https://www.work-with-perpetrators.eu/resources/guidelines.html>)

2. Parties shall take the necessary legislative or other measures to set up or support treatment programmes aimed at preventing perpetrators, in particular sex offenders, from re-offending.
3. In taking the measures referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2, Parties shall ensure that the safety of, support for and the human rights of victims are of primary concern and that, where appropriate, these programmes are set up and implemented in close co-ordination with specialist support services for victims.

How to use the Roadmap?

The Roadmap consists of a first part with three introductory chapters to set the stage for engaging perpetrators: further definitions and consequences of violence and abuse; accountability and victim safety; and beliefs towards men who use domestic violence. A flowchart then introduces the four steps to engage and refer perpetrators: Step 1 is identifying domestic violence and abuse in men; Step 2 is asking men about domestic violence and abuse, Step 3 is motivating men for referral and Step 4 is referring men to perpetrator programmes within a coordinated multi-agency response. A subsequent chapter deals with Ethical, professional (deontological) and legal dilemmas you might encounter in this work. The last chapter summarizes 12 do's and don'ts when engaging with a perpetrator. The References and an extensive Annex of tools and resources complete the Roadmap.

We hope it is useful for you!

Power, control and the consequences of violence and abuse

Despite what many people believe, violence and abuse is not due to the perpetrator's loss of control over their behaviour. In fact, most abusive behaviour and violence is a choice made by the abuser in order to control their (ex-) partners. Perpetrators may use a variety of tactics to control their partners and exert their power, including:

1. dominance (tell them what to do, and expect them to obey without question; treat the partner like a servant, child, or even as their possession);
2. humiliation (insults, name-calling, shaming, and public put-downs are all weapons of abuse designed to erode self-esteem and make the victim feel powerless);
3. isolation (keep partner from seeing family or friends, make partner ask permission to do anything, go anywhere, or see anyone);
4. threats (to hurt or kill partner, the children, other family members, or even pets; threaten to commit suicide, file false charges against partner/report partner to child services);
5. intimidation (threatening looks or gestures, smashing things in front of partner, destroying property, hurting pets, or putting weapons on display);
6. denial and blame (blame their abusive and violent behaviour on a bad childhood, a bad day, or even on partner and the kids; minimize the abuse or deny that it occurred; shift the responsibility to partner that somehow their violent and abusive behaviour is partner's fault).

As a frontline professional you have to be aware that some victims defend themselves violently (violent resistance) and that this has to be taken into account, especially when men present themselves as victims. They might be the primary perpetrator and a secondary victim. For a description of different types of domestic violence, see annex 1.

Consequences of domestic violence and abuse in women and children

Domestic violence and abuse have a huge negative impact on the lives of women and children who suffer it and do not only affect their health and well-being, but also their freedom and human rights, their identities and self-esteem, their possibilities to participate in social and public life; actually, almost any facet of their existence.

Domestic violence and abuse also have a negative impact on the men who use it.

For you as a frontline professional it is important to know about these consequences

- to fully understand an important aspect of domestic violence and abuse,
- to be able to assist perpetrators in gaining an understanding of them, to empathise with the victims/survivors and, hopefully, through this, to create a motivation to change,
- to be aware of the multiple devastating effects witnessing domestic violence has on children. Research has shown that these are basically the same as those of direct exposure to violence or maltreatment.

See annex 2 for more information on the consequences of domestic violence and abuse in women and children victims and in male perpetrators.

Ensuring accountability and victim safety

Focusing on the safety and well-being of women and children affected by violence is our main goal and priority at every stage of engaging with men as indicated in the Istanbul Convention. Specifically, this means that while identifying domestic violence and abuse in the men we work with, asking them about it, motivating them for change and referring them to a specialised service, we must also make sure that we focus on specific issues concerning the victims.

- The system matters – coordinated community response

For perpetrators to be held accountable and victims be empowered and safe it is necessary not only for specialised support service for victims and perpetrator programmes to be in place. It is important that the system responds to domestic violence in appropriate ways. Referrals to programmes should not be used as a way of avoiding criminal charges or simplifying responses and procedures that need to be in place to assure victim safety.

- Make sure all information provided by a victim remains confidential

When services are working both with the victim and with the perpetrator it is very important that information sharing procedures are in place. These must assure that no information that the victim provides to services is used directly with the perpetrators as this could put the victim at risk of retaliation. In decisions related to the course of intervention women's and children's safety must always be prioritized.

- Beware of expectations that women may have about perpetrators' change and how this might impact their decision to leave the perpetrator

The woman has to be provided with ways of holding the perpetrator accountable and of helping her evaluate if the violence and the level of safety and well-being are adequate for herself and her children. The women should be provided with information to curb unrealistic expectations but should at the same time be supported in developing a capacity to evaluate the situation and find benchmarks she can use to assess if and how much change has taken place.

- Avoid any form of couple counselling, therapy or mediation

When there is violence in a couple it must be addressed in a safe individual setting. Anytime the victim is exposed to procedures in the presence of the perpetrator she is at risk of retaliation and, even if there is no physical threat or danger, she may still feel coerced and the past violence can condition her response. In most situations of domestic violence there is also an imbalance of power that is a major counter indication for therapy where partners must stand on a footing of equality. For this reasons couple's counselling, therapy and mediation are not recommended once violence has been assessed.

- Beware of the manipulation perpetrators often pose on service providers and hold the perpetrator fully accountable for his violence avoiding any form of victim blaming

Perpetrator's manipulation is often very convincing because of the mechanism of minimization, denial of violence and of self-presentation as victims of the situation or of the "problematic" behaviour of their partners. In many cases there is as much self-deceiving as there is open deception and manipulation of service providers. One way of curbing and avoiding this kind of manipulation is for different professionals to support victims and perpetrators, and to have structured policies on how these kinds of situations should be handled. These procedures are very important to avoid any form of victim blaming.

- Make sure you focus on the well-being of children without blaming the mother for the consequences of violence

For a mother to be able to fully support her children's well-being she must be able to be in a protected, safe and empowered position. In evaluating the vulnerability and consequences of violence on children's lives hold into account the full responsibility and consequences of the father's violence on the children and mother.

- Provide support of specialized support service to victims that can ensure risk assessment, empowerment and safety planning

Services providing referrals to perpetrator programmes should always also be connected directly or indirectly with women's support services. In all cases that a perpetrator enters a programme there should be the possibility for the victim to access support and safety planning.

- Make sure there is a safety plan, even if women choose not to go to specialized support services so that her safety does not rely solely on the man being engaged in a perpetrator programme

Even if women chose not to go do specialized support service there should be a basic risk assessment and safety planning in place. This may be particularly important when it is the hope for a change of the perpetrator that prevents women from seeking assistance. Maximum effort should be made to address the expectation of the perpetrator programme and the women should always be encouraged to make choices to enhance their safety and freedom.

- The partner has no responsibility in the man's process or participation in the programme

Service providers working with the partner should always consider the man fully responsible for his choices and behaviours, avoiding in all ways to ask the woman to facilitate the man's process or participation in the.

Beliefs and positions towards men who use domestic violence and abuse

Beliefs about men who use violence and the work with them

As professionals we are immersed in our cultures and the social discourses that surround us. We are therefore prone to the influence of certain beliefs about domestic violence and abuse in general and about perpetrators and the work with them, specifically. To be able to give adequate responses to service users who perpetrate domestic violence, it is important to identify and revise these beliefs and myths. Some of the most frequent ones are:

- “Perpetrators are ill, they have psychiatric or psychological disorders”

Although some studies show that a number of perpetrators present with diagnoses of anxiety or depression or certain personality disorders, most don't and if they do, these co-occurring problems should not be understood as the causes of the violence, but as problems which are most probably related in a complex way with the use of violence, sometimes being the consequence, sometimes an aggravating factor with similar risk factors, etc. Moreover, understanding the men's violence as a (consequence of a) psychiatric or psychological disorder might make it difficult for the man to take responsibility for it and reinforce his justifications and presenting himself as a victim (of his disorder, in this case).

- “Men use violence because of alcohol and other substance use” this very common idea (even among many women who suffer domestic violence) has its roots in the co-occurrence of both problems: many men (but by far not all) who use substances also use violence against their partners and many perpetrators (but by far not all) also have problems with substance use. As in the case of the psychiatric disorders, it is important to note that the co-occurrence of both problems can't be interpreted as a simple causality (drugs cause violence) but that there is a complex bi-directional relationship between both, and a lot of common risk factors leading to co-occurrence (including traditional masculinity inviting to perform both as a sign of manhood). Substance use is a risk factor for perpetrating domestic violence and should prompt an exploration, but it is not its (main) cause.

- “All perpetrators were abused or witnessed domestic violence as children”

Adopting this (possibly reassuring) unique explanation of violence, which identifies the origin of violent behaviour in traumas suffered in childhood, may prevent us from identifying perpetrators who were not exposed to significant adverse childhood experiences. Although having suffered or witnessed domestic violence in childhood is an important risk factor for perpetrating it in adulthood it is by far not the only one within the multifactorial complexity of violent behaviours.

- “Perpetrators can be good fathers“ and/or “Perpetrators are always bad fathers”

Regarding perpetrators role as fathers we can observe two contradicting beliefs or myths. The first one states that the violence and abuse a man inflicts on his (ex) partner is or can be independent of his role as a father. In this regard, it is necessary to clearly state violence against the partner / mother always damages the children in some way, whether he is violent directly or “indirectly” towards them. Research has now widely shown that the negative effects of witnessing violence are basically the same as those from exposure to direct violence. A man who is violent with his partner is a dysfunctional father to the extent that he is unable to provide protection and damages the mother, her relationship with the children and her ability to care for them. On the other hand, it is also necessary to take into consideration the possibility that a perpetrator, while damaging his children by damaging their mother, can do reasonably well in other areas of parenting, being able to care for them and be empathic with them. Experience tells us that often, if identified, these areas can represent a real engine of change and are able to cascade the acquisition of other skills of life in other significant relational areas.

- “Violent men cannot change”

This belief might have its origin in the advocacy and support for women victims/survivors where dismantling the women's hope in the perpetrators' change would help to mobilize and empower her to protect herself and take decisions to go on with her life and is sometimes backed with not very convincing results from some evaluations of perpetrator programmes. The belief that violent men can't change implies strongly deterministic conception, which leaves little room for approaches aimed at the transformation of men and the social fabric within which violence is grafted and for the argument that the use of violence represents a choice. While recognising the fact that changing violent behaviours is a long and complex path and that often coercive control and psychological abuse is more resistant to change than physical violence, it is worth pointing out that men can change and some do.

Professionals' position towards the men and their violence and the working relationship

Our own experiences with the use of violence and our beliefs about violence and the men who use it will shape the way we relate to a (potential) perpetrator in our work. Therefore, it is important to be aware of our own experiences with violence and abuse (see annex 1) and of the emotions a perpetrator and the stories of his violence generate in us, to not let them interfere in a supportive professional response to the man.

The working relationship with men who use violence is one of the most important and challenging issues in addressing domestic violence. On the one hand, as professionals we need to accept the man as a person and to understand his experience and history, so that a collaborative and trustful working relationship can be established without colluding with the man. On the other hand, a clear stance against any type of violence or abuse and beliefs or attitudes supporting them is fundamental to hold men accountable and to make change possible.

- It will be important to neither collude with the man's possible discourse of denial, minimization, excuses and victim-blaming, nor to confront the man in an aggressive style, judging him and not showing any empathy.
- A balanced position of respectfully inviting the man to review and challenge his violent behaviour will be most helpful and effective.

See annex 4 for a more extensive description of these different positions in the working relationship with the men.

It is important to understand that the recognition of the violence used constitutes a process that has advances and setbacks, and that it is one of the most important and difficult elements to achieve, since it puts the man in internal conflict and threatens his own identity and associated relational patterns.

"What does the perpetrator evoke in us?"

(ENGAGE focus group, frontline professional)

"Is it possible for us to think that the abusive man is in suffering?"

(ENGAGE focus group, frontline professional)

"How do we feel when we are working with a man who despises us and despises women?"

(ENGAGE focus group, frontline professional)

engage Roadmap: 4 Steps

The safety and rights of the victims / survivors are the priority in all our interventions!

Record the man's disclosures and your observations, interventions and referrals / coordination in the case file.

Step 1: Identifying domestic violence and abuse in men – signs and indicators

As frontline professionals, there are three main ways to identify domestic violence and abuse in a male service user:

- universal or systematic screening,
- indicator-based detection, or
- information from third persons.

In universal or systematic screening we ask all our male service users about their use domestic violence and abuse (possibly using short questionnaires or structured interviews, usually during the intake phase). To avoid suspicions that could put the victims/survivors at risk (“Why are they asking me these questions? My partner must have told them.”) it is important to explain the routine and universal application of the screening to the men.

In indicator-based detection we do not screen for or address the issue of domestic violence with all male service users but only if we observe certain indicators or signs that make us suspect the man might be abusive.

A third way of identifying domestic violence is through third persons, often the (ex-) partners or children, sometimes other family members or through information shared by other professionals (reports, protection orders, court sentences, etc.).

If we receive information about the man’s violence from third persons it is key to distinguish whether this information is

- confidential and should be kept secret from the man to protect the safety of the victims/survivors in which case you should never use it directly and only very cautiously use it indirectly being alert to indicators of violence and initiating a process of detection by indicators (see below), or if it is
- public in the sense that the man knows that we have the information (e.g. because of protection orders, sentences or child protection proceedings due to his use of violence) and won’t suspect of the partner or children having shared it with you, in which case it might be safe and useful to address the issue of violence directly with him.

Indicators of domestic violence and abuse

As the main types of indicators of domestic violence and abuse we can differentiate:

Indicators in the man’s discourse:

- Talking about relationship behaviours that constitute different types of violence or abuse (physical, sexual, emotional, economic, social, see behaviour check-lists in annex 3),
- Referring excessively jealous behaviour and control over the partner ”who always has to tell him where she is“,
- Sexist or misogynistic attitudes or comments (about the partner or women in general),
- Euphemisms that could indicate any of the above (e.g., “big fight” or “strong argument”, etc.)

Indicators in the man's or partner's behaviour in the sessions or waiting room

(many retrieved from the ENGAGE interviews and focus groups in Italy, France and Spain):

- He always accompanies the partner, even during routine visits and insists on being in the sessions (and she is disappointed or in a hurry to finish),
- He speaks for her, interrupts or corrects her, doesn't let her talk, discredits or devalues her, tries to make decisions for her,
- He justifies or minimizes his partner's injuries or psychological states, which may be due to situations of violence,
- He blames her for his problems,
- He shows difficulties in managing anxiety and stress; he has mood swings and/or raises his voice,
- He shows two apparently contrasting attitudes: being silent, defensive, refusing to answer questions or being overly talkative and sometimes foul, overly compliant, smiling too much, being too present, especially during the interview with the partner,
- He shows a menacing non-verbal attitude or gesticulation invading the woman's space,
- He is violent or abusive towards his partner in the session or waiting room,
- He tries to manipulate or control the partner, professional or situation (e.g. the type of questions or the duration of the interview),
- He disqualifies female frontline professionals as women, or shows demeaning and aggressive attitude towards the female professional,
- The partner lowers her gaze, is silent or puts herself in a submissive attitude in the presence of the man,
- Differences in attitude of the woman between sessions with the man and sessions with her only;
- They represent the conflict and accuse each other or they give an exasperate sense of perfection of the relationship, denying any conflict.

The indicators and signs of domestic violence will not always be available directly, and need to be explored and investigated within a working relationship of respect, trust and support (see above), to obtain as much and as truthful information as possible.

“What I do is that he be the one to verbalize it ... with calm, trust, never with confrontation”

(ENGAGE focus group, frontline professional)

Step 2: Asking men about domestic violence and abuse

When asking male service users about domestic violence and abuse you should create an environment of privacy and safety that facilitates disclosure and be clear about the conditions of confidentiality that apply.

Specifically, confidentiality might be limited in case:

- you need to share information with other services to advocate for the safety and wellbeing of the man, his (ex-) partner and/or children;
- his (ex-) partner, children, another person or he himself is at high risk of harm.

We strongly recommend you do not address the issue of domestic violence and abuse with the male service user in the presence of his (ex-) partner or children, since involving them in this conversation might put them at risk if they disclose more than the perpetrator would want, or leave them deceived and even more powerless if they don't. If this situation is unavoidable carefully consider the safety of the victims/survivors.

Although it might seem difficult to discuss their use of violence with men, many of the men interviewed for the ENGAGE project recognized how important it was to them to find professionals who were able to address their violence and provide support.

“I needed someone to listen to me, to help me understand what was hidden behind my excessive reactions and controlling behaviour. I did not want to talk about others, about the relationship or other persons involved, and had to challenge the professional to get her to concentrate on just me”

(ENGAGE project, perpetrator interview)

Whether you systematically ask all service users about domestic violence and abuse or have detected (or suspect) it through indicators, you can start the conversation with the man through funnel questions:

- a) about the relationship and possible conflicts in general, or
- b) about the consequences of a possible presenting problem (e.g. stress, economical problems, substance abuse) on the relationship.

In both cases, you move from more general and open questions to more specific and concrete questions about the (possible) use of violence.

General funnel questions

How are things at home / with your partner? How would you define your couple relationship?

Most couples argue sometimes.

How do you and your partner handle disagreements or conflicts?

How do you normally act when you are angry?

What happens when your anger gets worse?

Do you think your partner (or children) are ever scared of you?

Have you said or done anything that you later regretted?

Have you ever acted in a way that embarrassed or scared you?

Have fights ever become physical?

Are you ever worried about your behaviour?

Do you feel jealous when your partner is with other people?

What do you think of your partner studying / working outside the home? What would you say if she wanted to do it?

What do you think about your partner spending time with your family or friends?

Do you shout at your partner or do you think you sometimes treat her in an authoritarian way?

Have you ever hit or pushed her?

Have you ever threatened to hurt her?
With a weapon?

Have you ever hurt her?

Have the police ever come for an argument or fight?

Specific funnel questions: Exploring the consequences of the presenting problem (X)

Has your problem X (stress, alcoholism, jealousy, etc.) affected your relationship? In which ways?

What does your partner think of your problem of X? How does it affect her?

When you are X (jealous / drunk / nervous / etc.), how do you react with your partner or children?

When you have been very X, have you ever lost your calm with your partner or children? What exactly did you do?

When your problem X was worse, did you ever do something that you later regretted?

What is the worst thing that happened when you were X?

Being X, have you ever thought about hurting yourself or killing yourself?

And about hurting or killing somebody else?

“The manner in which the professional tackled the problem of violence, I did not feel condemned from the professional. I was given hope that I could recover.”

(ENGAGE project, Bruno Brilloit, perpetrator interview)

The following strategies are useful in the process of asking about and exploring domestic violence and abuse with male service users:

- “Pulling the thread”:

Pulling the thread of a conversation or argument, is to explore with more detail the incidents of conflict and possible violence narrated superficially by the man. Using a credulous “Colombo attitude” of genuine interest and curiosity, we can ask for gaps and apparent inconsistencies or contradictions in the narration without a direct confrontation.

- “Gambit” – Accepting minimizations:

To initially “accept” minimizations or justifications, without directly confronting them allows us to explore the incidents of violence and the man’s experience and intentions more richly by not creating a defensive reaction. At this initial stage, we are more interested in knowing about the violence a man uses and its consequences than in naming it as “violence” and in him acknowledging it as such: “When you say ‘big fight’, what are you referring to?”, “What exactly happened / did you do?” “What do you think your partner felt?”

- Perspectives:

To inquire about the perspectives of significant others (partner, children, parents, siblings, friends, etc.) on their acts of violence, sometimes allows men to connect (from a certain empathy) with the consequences their violence has caused for others and initiate a process of accountability and motivation to change.

TIPS FOR INTERVIEWING MEN WHO USE VIOLENCE

Interviewing men who use violence might easily pose several typical challenges to you as a frontline professional:

- Perpetrators can be highly manipulative and very convincing in their discourse,
- Men typically deny or minimise the violence they’ve used or its consequences for others (not perceiving it as harmful) and rarely disclose it or talk about it openly,
- Many men blame the victims for the violence they’ve inflicted on them and some present themselves as the victims of their partners’ violence or refusal to fulfil their demands or expectations, others blame other people or circumstances, justifying their use of violence,
- Most men don’t take responsibility for the violence they’ve used,
- Most men are resistant or at least ambivalent to change.

Denial, minimisation and difficulties to openly disclose the full range of violent and abusive behaviours are usually based on the fear of the consequences of doing so (legal prosecution, losing their children, losing their job, etc.) and shame about these behaviours.

A balanced, non-judgemental stance (see above) can be helpful to reduce shame and specific questions about the worst fears of the consequences of disclosing violence can avoid the man feeling judged.

Use of scaling questions to find out about the details of violence and abuse (“on a scale of 1 to 5 – with 5 being punching her as hard as you can – how hard did you punch her?”) and pitching questions about violence at higher levels than you actually estimate, to make it easier for the man to admit to the (real) lower level:

Worker: "So, how many times did you hit her? Are we talking like 30 or 40 times?"

Man: "Good god, no! It was only a couple of times."

Worker: "Like 4 or 5 times?"

Man: "No, like three times."

Acknowledge the perpetrator's feelings or worries but focus attention on his actions and behaviour. For example<sup>6</sup>:

Perpetrator: "She just yells and screams and tells me to leave her alone when I talk to her about not spending too much money, I'm sick of it."

Frontline professional: "I can hear that you have a lot of worry about money. Can you tell me more about what happens in these situations, what do you do next?"

Partner blaming is very frequent when exploring his violence in the relationship, instead of risking to enter an argument it is much more helpful to resort to the basic conviction that the use of violence is wrong under any circumstances and whether the man's allegations about his partner or not is irrelevant for assessing the use and risk of violence. Iwi & Newman (2015) recommend to work on the basis of the following:

"I don't know your partner or her side of things – but let's assume that she will continue to be exactly as she always has, and let's focus on how you've responded – and later we'll think about how you could respond differently in the future."

De-escalating

If the man's position appears fixed, it is neither safe nor helpful to engage in debate. Agreeing to disagree might be the best approach, since the perpetrator leaving the interview in an agitated state or angry can pose a risk on his partner or children.

Considering risk and ensuring victim safety and support

If you have identified domestic violence and abuse in a service user, you should make sure that the victim is safe and receives the support she needs and you need to consider the risk the man is posing to her and how it might be reduced.

If the victim is also a user of your service, the victim should be seen by a different worker and directed to the appropriate specialized support service. If the victim is not a service user, you should consider cautiously reaching out to her through other services / agencies she might be involved with.

You also need to consider the risk the man is posing to his (ex-) partner and / or children and the steps to reduce it. As a frontline worker, it might not be your task to do a (formal) risk assessment, but if there are indicators of a high, immediate risk for considerable harm to the (ex-) partner and/or children (such as threats to hurt or kill them or to kill himself), you will have to take any necessary measures to protect the victims, including reporting to the relevant authorities / police forces.

Depending on the risk of future violence assessed and the particular circumstances and needs of each case/family, different risk management strategies can be put in place by the coordinated community response / system of agencies involved.

For more information on risk factors and assessment and on risk management strategies, please, see annex 6.

---

<sup>6</sup> From Department for Child Protection (2013): Perpetrator Accountability in Child Protection Practice.

Exploring the violence he uses in more detail

If the man has recognised his use of violence you could consider exploring the different types of violence he uses, its severity and frequency and the consequences it has (had) on his partner, his children, other people involved (family and friends) and on himself, as this information can be very useful to motivate him for a referral and to evaluate the risk he might be posing on others. See annex 5 for more information and questions to ask when exploring the use of violence.

Asking about other needs

While alcohol and/or substance use is neither an excuse nor a cause of domestic violence the two problems often occur together and referring some abusive men to substance abuse treatment is appropriate and might reduce their risk of using violence.

If your work context allows for it, you should therefore ask the man about problematic alcohol and drug use. If there are indicators of problematic alcohol use you might consider using the World Health Organization's Alcohol Use Disorders Identification Test (AUDIT)<sup>7</sup> as a reliable and simple screening tool which is sensitive to early detection of harmful or risky drinking. You can use its equivalent, the Drug Use Disorders Identification Test (DUDIT)<sup>8</sup> for screening for drug-related problems. If problematic alcohol or drug use are detected you should consider a referral to substance abuse treatment.

If you suspect that a man is suffering from a mental health problem it may be useful to refer him to mental health services for specialised assessment.

Recording

It is important to keep detailed records of the man's disclosure of violent and abusive behaviour and of the observations you've made. This is important information that will enable future case planning, exchange and coordination with other services and will be of help in any possible legal proceedings.

Record the information and file in the case notes. Remember that such records are strictly confidential unless an individual may be at risk of significant harm, which will override any confidentiality requirements.

TAKING CULTURE INTO ACCOUNT

Domestic violence and abuse is grounded in cultural norms related to gender, gender roles, and relationships. We all have culture, and it is important to know how that culture informs our narratives about relationships, families and domestic violence.

It is helpful to:

- respectfully enquire about a man's cultural identity—while culture profoundly shapes the way we see the world, each person experiences and lives culture differently; some may strongly identify with their cultural heritage while others may see their cultural heritage as a small part of their identity;
- be attuned to the extent that he uses culture as part of his violence-supporting narratives;
- explore who in his community might be able to support his journey toward keeping his family members safe;
- identify cultural practices that may help him manage his emotions; and
- identify aspects of culture that are likely to affect his engagement in services, for example, being unable to talk in front of a female professional.

<sup>7</sup> See <http://auditscreen.org>

<sup>8</sup> See <http://www.emcdda.europa.eu/best-practice/eib/dudit>

It is also vital to explore what in his culture supports non-violence and family safety. For some men, a narrative around treating family members and partners with respect might be important. For others (such as those who have faced cultural oppression), the idea of oppression being wrong might be more productive.

Adapted from: Department for Child Protection (2013): Perpetrator Accountability in Child Protection Practice

Step 3: Motivating perpetrators for referral

After identifying domestic violence (step 1) and addressing it with the man (step 2) you should be able to directly refer him to a perpetrator programme or another appropriate specialised service (step 4), only if he recognises the need to do something about his problem of violence and abuse. Many men may be ambivalent or even resistant about initiating a process of change and some motivational work might be needed to prepare a successful referral.

One of the main goals of engaging men is motivating perpetrators to take responsibility for their violence and for initiating a change process to stop it. Instead of trying to confront men with their “bad behaviour” and trying to persuade them to change it is far more useful to explore and strengthen their own values and reason to change. It is more likely that if they see the contradictions between what they would like (connection and meaningful relationships) and what they reach with violence (disconnection and fear) they might be more motivated to change.

In an initial phase the fear of legal sanctions and the loss of the relationship/child contact as a consequence of continued violence might be sufficient motivation to try and convince the man to seek help in a perpetrator programme. Over time it is important that motivation is also based on the man’s inner values and hopes and not only on the fear of consequences.

“Give advice and encourage persons to follow through and stick to the work needed to get past the violence as there is no magical solution and the work is difficult.”

“Help him in a humane way to get past the terrible image of himself and the shame he has for his actions ...”

“The manner in which the professional tackled the problem of violence, I did not feel condemned from the professional. I was given hope that I could recover.”

(Bruno Brilloit, ENGAGE perpetrator interview)

Both the Invitations to responsibility approach by Alan Jenkins (1990, 2009) and motivational interviewing (Miller & Rollnick, 1991, see annex 7) can assist professionals in the process of helping men to identify reasons for not using violence and what helps change in the desired direction. By asking questions about the man’s values, hopes and goals for his relationships, himself as a person and his life an ethical stance is explored which is then shown to be inconsistent with his violent behaviour. A collaborative, respectful approach is used instead of attempting to persuade or force the man into changing his behaviour.

Examples of questions within an invitation to responsibility approach are:

- What kind of a father did you hope to be / would you like to be?
_____
- How would you like your kids to see you / think of you in 10 or 20 years?
_____
- Have you kids seen you act violently or abusively? How do you think it affects them?
_____
- Do you think your children respect you or fear you?
_____
- How might your kids benefit if you did some work on your behaviour?
_____
- How do you think your relationship with your kids might change if they weren't feeling scared of you?
_____
- What could become possible in your life if you didn't use violence when you felt upset?
_____
- What type of father would you like to become, or be more of the time? What would it mean to you if you were that Dad, or that Dad more of the time? What do you do that gets in the way of this?
_____

It is also helpful to transmit to the man that he is not alone with this problem and that many men have been helped through specialised support. If there is enough motivation and commitment to engage in a change process, referring the man to a specialised perpetrator programme is the next step.

“It sounds like you want to make some changes for your benefit and for your partner/children. What choices do you have? What can you do about it? What help would you like to assist you to make these changes?”

Step 4: Referring men to a perpetrator programme, coordinated multi-agency response

If you have detected and addressed domestic violence in a service user and have been able to co-create sufficient acknowledgement and motivation for referral, you should refer the man to a perpetrator programme (or similar specialised service) to work towards stopping his abusive behaviours.

“Support the perpetrator and tell him there are specialised programmes and that he CAN CHANGE”

(perpetrator in ENGAGE interview)

The best way to do so is in a structured perpetrator programme which usually entails an individual intake and assessment phase, group (or individual) intervention and, ideally a follow-up phase to see whether objectives are achieved and maintained. Perpetrator programmes should fulfil different standards of quality, including to pro-actively contact the (ex-) partners of the men they work with to make sure they receive the information and support they need for them and their children to be safe.

Where no structured perpetrator programmes are available, individual counselling clearly aimed at stopping the use of violence might be an alternative if this includes risk assessment and management within a victim/survivor safety focused approach and is delivered by specifically trained professionals.

To establish a clear referral pathway, we strongly encourage you to find out about available perpetrator programmes (or specialised counselling offers) in your area that you can refer men to and contact them to gather the necessary information for referrals that you can include in the following table:

Name of the service / programme
Organization and address
Contact details
Contact person:
Tel:
e-mail:
Inclusion / exclusion criteria:
Cost:
Brief description / other info:
For more info:
Website
Flyer / info – material

We recommend you establish an agreement with the perpetrator programme(s) you might refer to that allows you to contact them before making the referral to agree upon the referral process and clarify any possible doubts or questions.

It is important to prepare the referral well and to inform the man about why he is being referred, what the benefits are for him and others, what his rights and responsibilities are in relation to the referral and what to expect from it. Provide the man with information material (like leaflets or flyers) about the perpetrator programme.

When referring a man, it is also very helpful to identify barriers to his uptake of the referral and the steps required to overcome these. Normalising the referral and his help-seeking behaviour by mentioning that many men participate in these programmes and that you frequently recommend them is one way to do so. You can also inquire about possible barriers and provide encouragement by asking:

*“Can you see yourself making the call?”, or say
 “Men can find it hard to ask for assistance when there’s a problem they need to address. What will be helpful for you to remember so that you’ll make this call?”*

When you refer to a specialised service you should:

- provide them with as much information as possible about the man, his context and his violence, to ensure that all professionals working with him and his family are aware of the violence and the current level of risk, and that their work also holds the man accountable for his violence.
- agree about the mechanism of feedback and coordination with the specialised service you refer the man to while you keep working with him and about how you can support his participation in the programme and contribute to monitoring the level of risk he poses.

Referrals for other needs

If you have detected other needs associated to the man's use of violence, such as problematic substance use or mental health problems (see step 2 above, "asking about other needs") you can consider referring them to the corresponding specialised support service (substance abuse treatment, mental health care). It is important to take into account that these services will not specifically address the violence the man uses and should be delivered at the same time and in coordination with the perpetrator programme. Be aware that it might be difficult for some men to initiate and maintain two parallel intervention processes, apart from the work he might be doing with you.

Unsafe or inappropriate referrals

Do not refer a man who uses domestic violence and abuse to anger management courses or programmes because these might (inadvertently) reinforce men's beliefs that violence is a result of their anger, of "losing control" rather than a choice leading to a pattern of controlling and coercive behaviours, and their tendency to see themselves as victims of those who they perceive as "making them angry". Also, anger management programmes do not include the contact with and support of the victims / survivors.

Similarly, couples' counselling or therapy, mediation and family therapy are at best inefficient and oftentimes potentially dangerous in dealing with domestic violence and abuse. If the victim/survivor feels she cannot speak freely because she fears retaliation, couples work will be ineffective and reinforce her sense of helplessness. If she does, she might be at greater risk. Generally, couples' or family approaches risk reinforcing the idea that violence is due to a relationship problem and that responsibility for it is somehow shared (instead of 100% of the perpetrator).

Referrals to general psychologists, psychotherapists or counsellors may not be helpful as these usually do not have the specific skills and experience related to gender-based violence and to the complex needs of perpetrators and might inadvertently buy into and reinforce the men's discourses supporting their use of violence or simply not address their violence and abuse as a priority.

Multi-agency response

Co-operation and prevention work between agencies involved in responding to domestic violence and abuse needs to happen on a day to day basis especially, but not only, in cases of immediate risk. The prevention of repeat and severe violence, including homicides, requires that agencies work closely together and that case conferences to prevent such violence be carried out regularly (Logar et al., 2015).

The purpose of engaging with an abusive man is not only about assisting him to change his attitudes and behaviour, but to ensure that his violence and the risk he poses to victims/survivors are at the centre of a coordinated multi-agency response. If a man refuses to engage, or does not change his abusive behaviour despite participating in a perpetrator programme, the response of other agencies involved with his family may need to change correspondingly. For example, risk management measures may need to be put in place or changes made to safety plans for the woman and children. Therefore, communication with other agencies involved with the family is important and, when children are involved, essential.

Ethical, professional (deontological) and legal dilemmas

Work with men that have been violent consistently brings about questions that are not easy to answer and involve different levels of assessment by the service provider. When is it necessary to report to the authorities a risky situation for the safety or well-being of the woman and/or of the children involved? How does the professional role and operating context affect legal obligations? How to maintain the alliance with the man in these cases?

To try to answer these and other questions, you must be aware that the effectiveness of your intervention depends not only on specific technical skills but also on the ability to take into account three further aspects of the specific context of working with domestic violence, legal, deontological and ethical aspects:

1. the legal aspect – violent behaviour is a criminal offence in most European countries and, in some cases, must be reported to the competent authorities; on the other hand, this has a great impact on the working alliance with the man and on his willingness to disclose violence;
2. the deontological aspect – deontological rules that guide correct behaviour from the professional point of view (e.g. as psychologists, social workers, medical doctors, etc.) in order to protect the wellbeing and the rights of the client and other people affected;
3. the ethical aspect – that is, that set of principles and internal assessments that help us decide which way is the best possible choice in a given situation.

As a first step, it is fundamental to be aware of the first two aspects. You need to know the legal and deontological regulations related to working with domestic violence and abuse that apply in your country and specific context / to your profession.

In every situation, it is advisable to carefully monitor the complex interaction between these dimensions in order to decide how to proceed. Due to the number of variables involved (e.g. the level of danger of the violent incident, the emotional involvement, the presence of children affected) we sometimes do not know what the best course of action should be.

A typical example is that of a case where, in light of the information gathered, we are seriously concerned that the man can harm his partner or children and we take the belaboured decision to report his situation to law enforcers. If we take action to ensure the safety of women and children, do we harm the man or our relationship with him? What and how much information about him should we share?

So, we face real dilemmas which could become blocking points if we do not take a clear position with respect to the purpose of our intervention, which will vary according to the professional role we play (social worker, educator, psychologist, doctor, etc.) and according to the context in which we operate (for example: public services or private activity).

The experience in the field proves that there are no definite guidelines to be followed and that each case must be carefully evaluated by following two essential procedures: an adequate assessment of the risk (see annex 6) and a discussion within the team or even a wider network, to avoid operating in solitude, which makes it even more complicated to decide how to act. It is important to tolerate complexity and avoid acting in a non-reflective way and to carefully weigh all the information available to decide how to proceed in an attempt to ensure the safety of women and children but also not to damage the relationship with the perpetrator and maximise the possibility of change.

FRONTLINE PROFESSIONALS' SELF-CARE

Working with people who have perpetrated (and/or experienced) domestic violence and abuse can be rewarding, but it is also challenging and it usually has an effect on you, especially in the long run. Apart from common symptoms of burnout, vicarious trauma or secondary traumatic stress can derive from being repeatedly exposed to other people's experiences and stories of traumatic events. Symptoms can include:

- Invasive thoughts of client's situation/distress
- Frustration/fear/anxiety/irritability
- Disturbed sleep/nightmares/racing thoughts
- Problems managing personal boundaries
- Taking on too great a sense of responsibility or feeling you need to overstep the boundaries of your role
- Difficulty leaving work at the end of the day/noticing you can never leave on time
- Loss of connection with self and others/loss of a sense of own identity

If you experience these symptoms it is important to be compassionate with yourself and understand these emotional responses as human and appropriate reactions to the challenges of this work and not as a lack of your professional abilities. It is recommended to talk to a trusted colleague or friend for support, find ways to physically and/or mentally disconnect (days off, reading, walking, connecting with friends or nature, etc.), rest and play and have fun.

To help avoid or prevent symptoms of vicarious trauma self care is fundamental and can include some of the following:

- Don't work on your own – maintain links with other colleagues / agencies and keep using support to think your responses through
- Make plans and create an environment that ensures your safety and is conducive to well-being
- Use supervision for emotional support and planning.
- Ensure that you have sufficient training for this work.
- Maintain interests completely separate from work
- Take regular breaks from work
- Take up opportunities for debriefing and other therapeutic support
- Spiritual engagement and spending time in nature
- Identifying successes, reminding yourself of small "wins"
- Maintaining connections with others outside the field
- Accepting support and positive feedback when it is offered
- Giving support and positive feedback to others
- Celebrating clients' resilience and sharing positive stories

In a nutshell: Twelve do's and don'ts when engaging with a perpetrator

We are aware that for many frontline professionals, contact with male services users is limited in time, for some it may only be one brief encounter. If this is your case, here are the twelve do's and don'ts to keep in mind when engaging with perpetrators<sup>9</sup>:

1. Have the safety and well-being of the victims/survivors (women and children) as your priority at any step in the process.

---
2. Be aware of any signs or indicators of domestic violence and abuse in male service users' discourse and behaviour.

---
3. Respond to any (even indirect) disclosure and ask men about domestic violence and abuse.

---
4. Be clear that violence and abuse are unacceptable and that they are a choice.

---
5. Be aware and convey to the man that domestic abuse includes a range of different behaviours, not only physical violence.

---
6. Be aware of your feelings about the man's behaviour and don't let them interfere with your provision of a supportive service: distinguish the behaviour from the person and don't be judgemental.

---
7. Be empathic and understanding but don't collude with the man: be aware of the mechanisms of minimization, denial and victim-blaming and don't give in to possible manipulations on his part.

---
8. Be aware of the barriers to him acknowledging his abuse and seeking help (such as shame, fear of child protection process) and recognise any accountability shown by him.

---
9. Be positive about the possibility of change and explore the man's own motivations for it (including the costs of continued violence to himself and the effects on children, even if they haven't witnessed the violence directly).

---
10. Establish a referral pathway to a perpetrator programme (or similar specialised service) in your area and refer the man to it.

---
11. If you are in contact with both partners, try not to see them together and only discuss domestic abuse in separate sessions.

---
12. Make sure that the victims/survivors receive adequate support and safety planning.

---

---

<sup>9</sup> Based on "Good practice in dealing with perpetrators" from Guidelines for Working with Men Perpetrating Domestic Violence (Respect Phonenumber, 2013), see annex 8

References

- Dia, David A., Simmons, Catherine A., Oliver, Mark A. & Cooper, R. Lyle (2009). Motivational Interviewing for Perpetrators of Intimate Partner Violence, in Lehman, Peter & Simmons, Catherine A. (Eds.) Strengths-Based Batterer Intervention: A New Paradigm in Ending Family Violence. Springer Publishing Company, United States.
- Department for Child Protection (2013). Perpetrator Accountability in Child Protection Practice: A resource for child protection workers about engaging and responding to perpetrators of family and domestic violence. Perth, Western Australia: Western Australian Government. Available on-line: <https://www.dcp.wa.gov.au/CrisisAndEmergency/FDV/Documents/Perpetrator%20Accountability%20in%20Child%20Protection%20Practice.pdf>
- European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (2014). Violence against women: an EU-wide survey - Results at a glance. Luxembourg: Publications Office of the European Union. Available on-line: <http://fra.europa.eu/en/publication/2014/violence-against-women-eu-wide-survey-results-glance>
- Geldschläger, H. & Ginés, O. (2013) Abordaje terapéutico de hombres que ejercen violencia de género. Formación Médica Continuada, 20, pp. 89-99
- Hester, M. & Lilley, S.J. (2014). Domestic and sexual violence perpetrator programmes: Article 16 of the Istanbul Convention. A collection of papers on the Council of Europe Convention on preventing and combating violence against women and domestic violence. Council of Europe. Available on-line: <https://rm.coe.int/168046e1f2>
- Iwi, Kate & Newman, Chris (2015). Engaging with Perpetrators of Domestic Violence: Practical Techniques for Early Intervention. London: Jessica Kingsley Publisher.
- Jenkins, Alan (2009). Becoming ethical: A parallel, political journey with men who have abused. Dorset (UK): Russell House.
- Jenkins, Alan. (1990). Invitations to responsibility: The therapeutic engagement of men who are violent and abusive. Adelaide: Dulwich Centre Publications.
- Kelly, J. B. & Johnson, M. P. (2008), Differentiation Among Types of Intimate Partner Violence: Research Update and Implications for Interventions. Family Court Review, 46, 476-499. doi:10.1111/j.1744-1617.2008.00215.x
- Lee, J. (2017). Using Motivational Interviewing to Treat Adolescents and Young Adults with Substance Use Disorders. A Case Study of Hazelden in Plymouth. Hazelden Betty Ford Butler Center for Research. Available on-line: <https://www.hazeldenbettyford.org/education/bcr/addiction-research/adolescent-motivational-interviewing-cs-1017>
- Logar, R. & Vargová, B.M. (2015). Effective Multi-agency Co-operation for Preventing and Combating Domestic Violence. Training of Trainers Manual. Council of Europe. Available online: https://wave-network.org/wp-content/uploads/2018/09/Effective\_Multi\_Agency\_Cooperation\_2015.pdf
- No To Violence & Men's Referral System (2015). Strengthening perpetrator accountability within the Victorian family violence service system. Available on-line: <http://www.rcfv.com.au/getattachment/E771CDC5-4D7C-4638-B3EE-546EA32871F1/No-To-Violence;-Men%27s-Referral-Service->
- Penti, B., Timmons, J. & Adams, D. (2018). The role of the physician when a patient discloses intimate partner violence perpetration: a literature review. Journal of the American Board of Family Medicine, 31, 635–44.
- Ponce, A. (2013). Homes, masculinitat i violència. In Freixanet, Maria (coord.): Homes i Gènere: Polítiques públiques locals i la transformació de les masculinitats. Editorial Institut de Ciències Polítiques.
- RESPECT (2013). Respect toolkit for work with male victims of domestic violence (2nd edition). London: Respect. Available online: <http://respect.uk.net/wp-content/uploads/2017/01/Toolkit-for-Work-with-male-victims-of-DV-2nd-ed.-Respect%2%A9-2013.pdf>
- RESPECT Phoneline (2013). Guidelines for Working with Men Perpetrating Domestic Violence. Available online: <http://respectphoneline.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2017/01/Guidelines-for-working-with-perpetrators.doc>
- Miller, W. R. and Rollnick, S. (1991). Motivational interviewing: Preparing people to change addictive behavior. New York: Guilford Press

Annex of Tools and Resources

1. Different types of domestic violence and abuse

Michael P. Johnson and colleagues<sup>10</sup> developed a useful typology of domestic violence. Five types of partner violence are identified based on the context of power and control in the relationship:

- In coercive controlling violence, the individual (most often men) is violent and controlling (while the partner is not) and typically uses several of the control tactics described in the Power and Control Wheel (Pence & Paymar, 1993): intimidation; emotional abuse; isolation; minimizing, denying, and blaming; use of children; asserting male privilege; economic abuse; and coercion and threats.
- In violent resistance, the individual (most often women) uses violence but not control tactics, in resistance or defence against the partner who uses coercive controlling violence.
- In situational couple violence, one or both partners use violence in situations of conflict (often out of frustration or anger) but neither uses coercive control over the other.
- In separation instigated violence, one (or rarely both) partners uses violence after separation (often triggered by a specific experience, and usually not more than once or twice) without a prior history of violence in the relationship and without coercive control (to be distinguished from the coercive controlling violence that often goes on or escalates after separation).
- In mutual violent control, both partners use coercive controlling violence against each other (a not very frequent and not much researched constellation).

---

<sup>10</sup> See Kelly & Johnson (2008)

2. Consequences of domestic violence and abuse

Health Problems Associated with Intimate Partner Violence
Impact on Victim	Impact on Children Witnesses	Impact on Perpetrators
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>▪ Poor pregnancy outcomes</li> <li>▪ Depression, post-traumatic stress disorder, and suicide</li> <li>▪ Increased risk for job loss</li> <li>▪ Increased mortality</li> <li>▪ Chronic pain</li> <li>▪ Neurologic symptoms (fainting, seizures)</li> <li>▪ Gastrointestinal symptoms (eating disorders, irritable bowels)</li> <li>▪ High blood pressure</li> <li>▪ Gynecologic problems (pelvic pain, sexually transmitted diseases)</li> </ul>	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>▪ Depression and anxiety</li> <li>▪ Substance problems as adults</li> <li>▪ Risky sexual behaviour amongst adolescent girls</li> <li>▪ Poor school performance</li> <li>▪ Emotional and behavioural problems</li> <li>▪ Poor overall health as adult (ACE studies)</li> <li>▪ Somatic complaints such as headaches, sleep problems,</li> <li>▪ Stomach aches</li> <li>▪ Boys may be violent as adults and girls may not question violence used against them as adults</li> </ul>	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>▪ Regret and depression</li> <li>▪ Poor job performance</li> <li>▪ Incarceration and other legal problems</li> <li>▪ Divorce and separation from family</li> <li>▪ Physical injuries</li> <li>▪ Substance abuse</li> <li>▪ Psychiatric disease</li> <li>▪ High-risk sexual behaviour</li> <li>▪ Insomnia</li> <li>▪ Digestive problems</li> </ul>

From WHO Infographic “Violence against Women: Global Picture Health Response”

The Effects of Domestic Violence on Children<sup>11</sup>

Witnessing domestic violence can mean SEEING actual incidents of physical/and or sexual abuse. It can mean HEARING threats or fighting noises from another room. Children may also OBSERVE the aftermath of physical abuse such as blood, bruises, tears, torn clothing, and broken items. Finally children may be AWARE of the tension in the home such as their mother’s fearfulness when the abuser’s car pulls into the driveway.

<sup>11</sup> Retrieved and adapted from : <https://www.domesticviolenceroundtable.org/effect-on-children.html>

What are the feelings of children who are exposed to domestic violence?

Children who are exposed to battering become fearful and anxious. They are always on guard, watching and waiting for the next event to occur. They never know what will trigger the abuse, and therefore, they never feel safe. They are always worried for themselves, their mother, and their siblings. They may feel worthless and powerless. Children who grow up with abuse are expected to keep the family secret, sometimes not even talking to each other about the abuse. Children from abusive homes can look fine to the outside world, but inside they are in terrible pain. Their families are chaotic and crazy. They may blame themselves for the abuse thinking if they had not done or said a particular thing, the abuse would not have occurred. They may also become angry at their siblings or their mother for triggering the abuse. They may feel rage, embarrassment, and humiliation.

Children of abuse feel isolated and vulnerable. They are starved for attention, affection and approval. Because mom is struggling to survive, she is often not present for her children. Because dad is so consumed with controlling everyone, he also is not present for his children. These children become physically, emotionally and psychologically abandoned.

What behaviors do children who witness domestic violence exhibit?

The emotional responses of children who witness domestic violence may include fear, guilt, shame, sleep disturbances, sadness, depression, and anger (at both the abuser for the violence and at the mother for being unable to prevent the violence).

Physical responses may include stomachaches and/or headaches, bedwetting, and loss of ability to concentrate. Some children may also experience physical or sexual abuse or neglect. Others may be injured while trying to intervene on behalf of their mother or a sibling.

The behavioral responses of children who witness domestic violence may include acting out, withdrawal, or anxiousness to please. The children may exhibit signs of anxiety and have a short attention span which may result in poor school performance and attendance. They may experience developmental delays in speech, motor or cognitive skills. They may also use violence to express themselves displaying increased aggression with peers or mother. They can become self-injuring.

What are the long-term effects on children who witness domestic violence?

Whether or not children are physically abused, they often suffer emotional and psychological trauma from living in homes where their fathers abuse their mothers. Children whose mothers are abused are denied the kind of home life that fosters healthy development. Children who grow up observing their mothers being abused, especially by their fathers, grow up with a role model of intimate relationships in which one person uses intimidation and violence over the other person to get their way. Because children have a natural tendency to identify with strength, they may ally themselves with the abuser and lose respect for their seemingly helpless mother. Abusers typically play into this by putting the mother down in front of her children and telling them that their mother is “crazy” or “stupid” and that they do not have to listen to her. Seeing their mothers treated with enormous disrespect, teaches children that they can disrespect women the way their fathers do.

Most experts believe that children who are raised in abusive homes learn that violence is an effective way to resolve conflicts and problems. They may replicate the violence they witnessed as children in their teen and adult relationships and parenting experiences. Boys who witness their mothers’ abuse are more likely to batter their female partners as adults than boys raised in nonviolent homes. For girls, adolescence may result in the belief that threats and violence are the norm in relationships.

Children from violent homes have higher risks of alcohol/drug abuse, post traumatic stress disorder, and juvenile delinquency. Witnessing domestic violence is the single best predictor of juvenile delinquency and adult criminality. It is also the number one reason why children run away.

See also: Sharpen, Joanna (2009). Improving Safety, Reducing Harm: Children, young people and domestic violence. A practical toolkit for front line professionals. London: TSO. Available on-line: http://webarhive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20130124052343/http://www.dh.gov.uk/prod\_consum\_dh/groups/dh\_digitalassets/@dh/@en/@ps/documents/digitalasset/dh\_116914.pdf

3. Reflecting on our own experiences with domestic violence and abuse

What most professionals discover as they gain more information and experience in domestic violence is that training and learning are not enough. Working with domestic violence we always have to consider its social context, understanding it, as does the Istanbul Convention, as “a manifestation of historically unequal power relations between women and men”. We as professionals, were born, raised and live in the same society and cultural context of violence and discrimination against women and are also affected by this context and culture.

So, if we want to improve our professional response to male service users who use domestic violence, we not only need to acquire the knowledge and skills to do so, we also need to be aware of how the social context of unequal power relations and of discrimination and violence against women affects us personally. This includes what we view as violence, how we understand it and how we react in the face of it.

Unless we ask ourselves uncomfortable questions on how we deal with any form of violence in our daily lives (some may seem very small) we might be missing out on very important clues from our service users. The men we interviewed on their experience of help-seeking for their violence said that it has been really difficult to find frontline professionals who would address and openly talk about violence. One of them, for example, had been trying to get help from a psychologist, but the professional was not able to discuss the violence: “I told the therapist that I had a ‘reactive’ character, but he didn’t say anything”.

We should be able to recognize violent or abusive behaviours in everyday life every time we use them (and probably all of us do at some point), somebody uses them against us and somebody uses them in front of us (but against somebody else). We will be surprised to discover how often we brush away a harsh remark, an offensive answer or a disrespectful attitude. These behaviours all need to be recognized and uncovered in order to be “de-normalized” so that we can be able to call out abusive behaviour without minimization.

We invite you, as an exercise, to take a small test, which we ask men to respond to identify the violence and abuse they might be using<sup>12</sup>. You can take it from the three perspectives mentioned above: behaviours you have used, behaviours you have received and behaviours you have witnessed:

- Do you sometimes behave like you are your partner’s boss?
_____
- Do you say or do things that you regret later?
_____
- Are you trying to control everything?
_____
- Is it difficult for you to control yourself sometimes?
_____
- Is/are your child/children or partner ever afraid of you?
_____
- Is your relationship influenced by your behaviour?
_____
- Are you doing harm to the people you love the most?
_____
- Have you ever tried to prevent your partner from doing something they wanted to do? (like dress in a way you didn't like, go out with friends, have a job or study)
_____
- Have you ever followed or controlled your partner's movements (perhaps by calling or constantly sending messages at strange times)?
_____
- Have you ever frightened your partner and/or children with your behaviour?
_____
- Have you ever pressured your partner or other women to have sex when they did not want to?
_____
- Are you jealous and/or have you ever accused your partner of paying too much attention to someone else?
_____

---

<sup>12</sup> Test taken from the website of one of the partners of this project a perpetrator centre Centro di Ascolto Uomini Maltrattanti (CAM) in Florence, www.centrouominimaltrattanti.org inspired by Men’s Referall Service Australia 2009 website.

- Have you ever offended, criticized or made your partner and/or your children feel stupid about their ideas?

---
- Have you ever slapped, beaten or pushed your partner - or threatened to do so?

---
- Do you control your household finances, perhaps controlling all the expenses and not allowing your partner to use money for personal things?

---

If you answered yes to two or more of these questions you have a starting point to observe these behaviours under a different lens. To be able to work with domestic violence it is fundamental to start from our own experience and reflect on how we may have been victims, perpetrators or witnesses of violence ourselves, how this has impacted us and how these experiences, in turn, may affect our personal and professional responses to violence and abuse. We suggest you extend these personal reflections into conversations with your team members or supervisors, if you feel comfortable to do so.

4. Different positions and the therapeutic relationships they produce

The following table intends to summarize three possible positions towards the men and their violence, the collusive one that doesn't challenge the violence and thus will hardly produce any change, the confronting one that will probably create a defensive reaction and little change in the man and the understanding (but critical) position described above.

Different positions and the therapeutic relationships they produce
Collusion	Balanced	Confrontation
Alliance forms	Alliance forms with the part of him that wants to change	No Alliance, rather opposition
Session is experienced with feelings of closeness	Sessions are difficult because the man experiences internal conflicts and feelings of vulnerability	Sessions are difficult because of the conflict with the man, who mainly feels angry
There is little challenge or conflict	You make gentle but persistent invitations to the man to challenge himself	There is a high level of challenge and conflict
You sit alongside him to review others' behaviours	You assist him to review his abusive behaviours.	You confront him with his wrongdoings.
You empathise when he talks about himself as a victim of others	You empathise when he feels bad about his abuse	You don't empathise at all
Much of the interview is spent reviewing other people's behaviours and the impact on the man.	Much of the interview is used to review the man's abusive behaviour and its impact on others	Much of the time is spent on confronting the man with how badly he acted and the man defending himself
The session is non-judgemental	You invite the man to make judgments about his own behaviour and empathise with how hard that is.	You let the man know your judgments – both professional and personal – about his behaviour.
The man might feel much more understood by you than by his partner	The man may come to value and respect your help	The man dislikes you and may let you down

Table adapted from Iwi & Newman (2015, p. 26)

In relation to positioning, it is important to emphasize that the professional will have a reflective and critical role regarding the abusive behaviour of the man, and that therefore it will be an essential part of the work of the professional to evaluate the damage that has been caused. The mobilization for change will happen when the man experiences internal conflict or dissonance which becomes unsustainable for him. For this to happen, the interviewer's job will be to help build the part of the man that wants a better life, the part of his self with which violence and abuse do not fit well, the part that cares about his family and he would feel very bad if someone hurt them.

5. Exploring the use of violence in more detail

If the man has recognised his use of violence exploring the different types of violence he uses, its severity and frequency and the consequences it has (had) on his partner, his children, other people involved (family and friends) and on himself, can be very useful to motivate him for a referral (step 4) and to evaluate the risk he might be posing on others. It can also be of interest to know about the history of his use of violence and possible patterns in it, especially if there has been an increase in severity or frequency lately.

It is helpful to ask an introductory question like: "Is it ok if I ask you some more specific questions about this?" Some questions you might ask about the history of his use of violence are:

- "Do you remember the first time you got physical in a fight / laid your hand on your partner?"

---
- "What was the worst thing you've ever done to her?" "What would she say was the worst thing you did to her?" "How do you think she felt then?"

---
- "What was the last incident of being abusive to her?"

---
- "Did/has your behaviour changed towards your partner during pregnancy?"

---
- "Are you aware of any patterns – is the abuse getting worse or more frequent?"

---
- "How are the children affected?"

---
- "Have you assaulted your partner in front of the children?"

---
- "Have you ever assaulted or threatened your partner with a knife or other weapon?"

---
- "Have the police ever been called to the house because of your behaviour?"

---
- "What worries you most about your behaviour?"

---
- "Have you ever used violence in other relationships?" "Please, tell me more about it."

---

Other questions have to do with his history of suffering or witnessing violence:

- "Have you ever been abused or have you ever suffered violence as a child?" "Or at any other time in your life?"

---
- "Was there violence in your home, between your parents?" "What do you remember?" "How did you feel about it?"

---

Also, you should explore the use of the following different kinds of violence and abuse in the recent past and present:

- Emotional abuse

---
- Coercive and controlling behaviours

---
- Physical violence

---
- Sexual violence

---
- Economic violence

---

You might want to use the following behaviour checklists or inventories, be it to guide your questions or for the man to fill them in and then discuss them together.

Behaviour checklists

The European prevalence study (FRA, 2014) used the following behaviour checklists as indicators for GBV<sup>13</sup>:

Controlling behaviour of the partner:

1. Try to keep you from seeing your friends?
2. Try to restrict your contact with your family of birth or relatives?
3. Insist on knowing where you are in a way that goes beyond general concern?
4. Get angry if you speak with another man/woman?
5. Become suspicious that you are unfaithful?
6. Prevent you from making decisions about family finances and from shopping independently?
7. Forbid you to work outside the home?
8. Forbid you to leave the house, takes away your car keys or locks you up?

Psychological violence:

9. Belittled or humiliated you in front of other people?
10. Belittled or humiliated you in private?
11. Done things to scare or intimidate you on purpose, for example by yelling and smashing things?
12. Made you watch or look at pornographic material against your wishes? Threatened to take the children away from you?
13. Threatened to hurt your children?
14. Hurt your children?

Physical violence:

15. Threatened to hurt you physically?
16. Pushed you or shoved you?
17. Slapped you?
18. Thrown a hard object at you?
19. Grabbed you or pulled your hair?
20. Beat you with a fist or a hard object, or kicked you?
21. Burned you?
22. Tried to suffocate you or strangle you?
23. Cut or stabbed you, or shot at you?
24. Beat your head against something?

Sexualized violence:

25. Your current partner has forced you into sexual intercourse by holding you down or hurting you in some way? (IF NEEDED ADD: By sexual intercourse we mean here forced oral sex, forced anal or vaginal penetration)
26. Apart from this, your current partner has attempted to force you into sexual intercourse by holding you down or hurting you in some way? (IF NEEDED ADD: By sexual intercourse we mean here forced oral sex, forced anal or vaginal penetration)
27. Apart from this, your current partner has made you take part in any form of sexual activity when you did not want to or you were unable to refuse?
28. Or have you consented to sexual activity because you were afraid of what your current partner might do if you refused?

The following two behaviour inventories, version A for abusive behaviours and version V for violent behaviours, were created by Calvin Bell from Safer Families/Ahimsa and are available on-line at: http://www.fsa.me.uk/uploads/7/6/5/6/7656227/violence\_and\_abuse\_inventories.pdf

---

<sup>13</sup> The following questions are taken out of the European wide survey about violence against women of FRA: <http://fra.europa.eu/en/publication/2014/violence-against-women-eu-wide-survey-survey-methodology-sample-and-fieldwork>

Name			Date
BAHAVIOUR INVENTORY A
? don't know	0 never	1 once	2 occasionally	3 frequently	4 constantly
Score yourself here	Instructions. Using the scale above, place a score in each box in the left-hand column to indicate how often you have behaved towards your (ex-) partner in the way described. Then score her in the right-hand column. Delete or change any words that don't apply.				Score her here
	Insulted her (such as calling her a hurtful name)
	Humiliated her (made fun of her)
	Told her that she was worthless or ugly
	Told her that she was stupid or mad
	Told her that she was a bad parent
	Told her that no-one else would put up with her
	Told her that she wouldn't be able to cope on her own
	Tried to stop her having contact with her friends or family
	Insisted on accompanying her whenever she went out
	Locked her in
	Insisted on knowing who she was with at all times you were not together
	Accused her unfairly of having sex with other men
	Followed her or checked up on her when you were not together
	Threatened to kill yourself if she left you
	Threatened to report her to the police/social services/immigration if she left you
	Threatened to kidnap the child/ren if she left you
	Told her that you would never let her bring up the child/ren with another man
	Insisted she obey you or tried to control just about everything she did
	Insisted she carry out housework to your standard
	Forced her to cook meals that you chose
	Forced her to wear clothes or make-up that you chose for her
	Controlled the money (e.g. dictated how the family income was spent)
	Put her on an 'allowance' or made her ask or beg for money
	Made her account for every penny her spent
	Made false allegations about her to the police/social services (delete as necessary)
	Frightened her with your temper
	Punched or kicked the door, wall or furniture
	Stopped her using the phone to get help
	Intentionally damaged her clothes, possessions or property
	Swore and shouted in her face
	Physically threw her out of the home
	Smashed plates or threw food or objects around
	Threatened her by raising your fist at her
	Threatened her with an object
	Threatened to kill her

Name		Date
BAHAVIOUR INVENTORY V
?	0	1	2	3	4
don't know	never	once	occasionally	frequently	constantly
I've done this to her	Instructions. using the scale above, place a score in each box in the left-hand column to indicate how often you have behaved towards your (ex-) partner in the way described. Then score her in the right-hand column.				She's done this to me spat at her
	poked her with my finger pushed her dragged her by the clothes, arm, leg, or hair (delete as necessary)
	held her by the arms or shoulders grabbed or shook her (delete as necessary)
	pinned her up against the wall pulled her hair
	threw her around twisted or bent her finger, arm or leg (delete as necessary)
	pinched, scratched or squeezed her (delete as necessary) bit her poured or threw a drink or other liquid over her (delete as necessary)
	threw things at her that could hurt
	burnt her with a cigarette slapped her
	hit her with the back of my hand punched her to the arm, leg, body, head or face (delete as necessary) kicked her in the arm, leg, body, head or face (delete as necessary)
	banged her head
	head-butted her
	pushed her down the stairs
	smothered her mouth
	held her by the throat
	tried to choke or strangle her hit her with an object stabbed her
	assaulted her when you knew she was pregnant				—
	punched her in the abdomen when you knew she was pregnant				—

VERSION 8 Copyright Calvin Bell; Safer Families/Ahimsa

6. Risk assessment and management

Risk assessment

To be able to improve the safety of victims/survivors and prevent future violence and abuse it is helpful for service providers to assess the risks that are posed by a perpetrator and to determine what steps can be taken to reduce it. Both safety measures for the victims and risk management strategies (including interventions) with the perpetrators should be informed by risk assessment.

As a frontline worker, it might not be your task to do a formal risk assessment, but you will have to assess risk (implicitly or explicitly) to be able to take the abovementioned decisions on safety measures and risk management.

There are mainly three forms in which risk factors are identified and evaluated in risk assessment:

- clinical assessment (based on the experience of the professional),
- actuarial assessment (research-based “test” with pre-established weightings of the risk factors that professionals have to tick as absent or present),
- structured clinical assessment (a list of evidence-based risk factors guides the professional in their assessment/judgement).

In any case, risk assessment can only be as good as the information it is based on. Therefore, in assessing risk you should try to include as many sources of information as possible, especially the partner’s perspective, since the women’s perception of danger has been proven to be the single best predictor of future violence, but also police records and information from any other agency attending to the man or his family. If the information is mainly provided by the perpetrator, the limitations in accuracy of risk assessments should be taken into account and will partly depend on the trust developed in the working relationship.

There are quite a few risk assessment tools or instruments available<sup>14</sup>, although most of them are developed for the use based on the information provided by the victim/survivor. In the context of the work with perpetrators in Europe two of them stand out as the most used<sup>15</sup>:

1. SARA (Spousal Assault Risk Assessment; Kropp, Hart, Webster & Eaves, 1994) The SARA is a checklist to assist case management determining risk for violence that might occur in the context of spousal assault,
2. DASH-RIC (Domestic Abuse, Stalking and Honour Based Violence Risk Identification Checklist)<sup>16</sup> is designed to help practitioners identify high risk cases of domestic abuse, stalking and honour based violence.

If you are part of a coordinated community response against domestic violence or a local roundtable, we would highly recommend for you to use the risk assessment tool used there (or by your local survivor support service).

---

14 See the useful overview provided in the PROTECT project: http://files.wave-network.org/trainingmanuals/PROTECTI\_Protecting\_High\_Risk\_Victims\_2011\_English.pdf

15 See Ginés, Geldschläger et al. (2014)

16 See http://www.safelives.org.uk/sites/default/files/resources/Dash%20for%20DVAs%20FINAL\_0.pdf

Most risk assessment instruments are based on similar empirically derived risk factors, some of which are static (unchanging factors like personal characteristics, past events or permanent circumstances) and others dynamic (personal characteristics or circumstances that change). The level of risk decreases or increases as the dynamic risk factors change and it is therefore important to monitor risk in an ongoing way and reassess if you observe changes in dynamic risk factors. Some of the main risk factors are:

- Victim fears for her own or her child/ren's safety
- Recent or imminent separation
- Child custody or access disputes
- Past assault of family members
- Past assault of strangers or acquaintances
- Past breach or ignoring of injunctions, court orders or conditions
- Victim and/or witness of "family" violence as child or adolescent
- Substance misuse
- Recent mental ill-health relating to violence
- Past physical assault of partner
- Partner pregnant or recently given birth
- Sexual assault or sexual jealousy
- Past use of weapons or threats of death
- Recent escalation in frequency or severity of assaults
- Extreme minimisation or denial of domestic violence history
- Attitudes that support or condone domestic abuse
- Recent relationship problems
- Recent employment problems
- Attempted strangulation (choking)
- Suicidal tendencies or threats or attempts to commit suicide by the perpetrator
- New partner in victim's life
- Past threats and/or harm to children
- Past assault on victim while pregnant

Risk management

Depending on the risk of future violence assessed and the particular circumstances and needs of each case/family, different risk management strategies should be put in place by the coordinated community response / system of agencies involved (see step 6, below). As a frontline professional and depending on your role, you might be in a position to recommend or initiate some of these risk management strategies, but you should certainly collaborate in developing them in coordination with other services.

Especially if you assess a high, immediate risk for considerable harm to the (ex-) partner and/or children, you will have to take any necessary measures to protect them including reporting to the relevant authorities / police forces and informing the victim/survivor and other relevant services. If possible, this should be explained to the man so he does not attribute any intervention by the authorities to the victim/survivor.

In high and medium risk cases, monitoring the perpetrator and the risk he poses on the (ex-) partner and/or children is another important risk management strategy. It can include frequent contacts (face-to-face or by telephone) with the perpetrator, as well as with the potential victim/survivor and other relevant people (e.g., other health or social workers involved, probation officers, family members, co-workers) in the form of face-to-face meetings or telephone calls. These contacts convey a sense of surveillance to the perpetrator that can help reduce his violent and abusive behaviour and, on the other hand, serve to monitor risk factors over time identifying possible “red flags” of imminent or high risk.

Depending on the complexity of the case and the level of risk, shared risk management might be established either through separate communications with different services or, if required, through face-to-face meetings or Skype/telephone conferences with all professionals / services involved (e.g. multi-agency risk-assessment conferences – MARACs<sup>17</sup>).

If possible (the man has acknowledged his use of violence – at least to some degree – and shown some motivation to change) the man should be involved in managing the risk he poses to the victims/survivors. In this case, you might share the outcome of your risk assessment and your concern for the safety of his (ex-) partner and/or children with him and discuss the most effective measures to reduce this risk under their current circumstances. These should focus on ways he can contribute to improved safety by reducing his violence and abuse. Possible risk management strategies include:

- complying with any police or court orders, protection or restraining orders or civil court decisions on child custody, contact, etc.,
- leaving the family home for a (limited) time period (until things have calmed down),
- leaving the house / walking away when he feels he is getting angry/frustrated and could become violent or abusive,
- allowing the victim/survivor to leave (with the children) if she feels unsafe,
- not drinking or taking drugs for some time / at home, before being with his (ex-) partner or children,
- finding a support person/s who he can turn to if he needs help or a place to cool off and who can support him with the agreed measures and his process of change in general,
- referral to a specialist domestic violence program, or appropriate form of individual counselling (see step 5, below)
- referral to other specialist services for possible related problems such as substance abuse or mental health.

While discussing his role in creating safety for his (ex-) partner and/or children with the man you should:

- help him to recognise the choices he makes when continuing (or even escalating) their violence and abuse, and their responsibility in choosing to stop his use of violence,
- hold him accountable by highlighting the criminal nature of his violence and discussing its possible legal consequences.

---

17 See <http://www.safelives.org.uk/sites/default/files/resources/MARAC%20FAQs%20General%20FINAL.pdf>

7. Motivational Interviewing

Motivational interviewing<sup>18</sup> facilitates the generation of an interpersonal process based on the following ideas:

1. The motivation to change is elicited from the man and is not imposed from the outside.

---
2. It is the task of the man, and not the interviewer, to articulate and resolve their ambivalences.

---
3. Direct persuasion is not an effective method to resolve ambivalences.

---
4. The style of the interview is always calm and reflective.

---
5. The interviewer is a manager in helping the man to examine and resolve his ambivalence.

---
6. The willingness to change is not a personality trait of the client / user, but a fluctuating product of interpersonal interaction.

---
7. The therapeutic relationship is more that of an ally or partner than of an expert.

---

from Lee (2017)

<sup>18</sup> See Dia et al. (2009)

8. Good practice in work with perpetrators

Domestic violence and abuse is a serious issue and professionals involved have a role in providing good responses, which hold perpetrators responsible. Your response to the man and any disclosures could affect the extent to which he accepts responsibility for his behaviour and, therefore, for the need to change. You can say things to a perpetrator that make a difference (to him and his partner and children) and you can influence the situation. In any dealings with perpetrators you should adopt the following good practice responses within your own work context, which are both safe and constructive.

Good Practice in Dealing with Perpetrators

1. Be clear that abuse is always unacceptable
2. Be clear that abusive behaviour is a choice
3. Affirm any accountability shown by the man
4. Be respectful and empathic but do not collude
5. Be positive, men can change
6. Do not allow your feelings about the man's behaviour to interfere with your provision of a supportive service
7. Be straight-forward; avoid jargon
8. Be clear that you might have to speak to other agencies and that there is no entitlement to confidentiality if children are at physical or emotional risk
9. Whatever he says, be aware that, on some level he is unhappy about his behaviour
10. Be aware, and tell the man, that children are always affected by living with partner violence, whether or not they witness it directly
11. Be aware, and convey to the man, that domestic abuse is about a range of behaviours, not just physical violence
12. Do not back him into a corner or expect an early full and honest disclosure about the extent of the abuse;
13. Be aware of the barriers to him acknowledging his abuse and seeking help (such as shame, fear of child protection process, self-justifying anger)
14. Be aware of the likely costs to the man himself of continued abuse and assist him to see these
15. If you are in contact with both partners, always try to see them separately if you are discussing abuse.

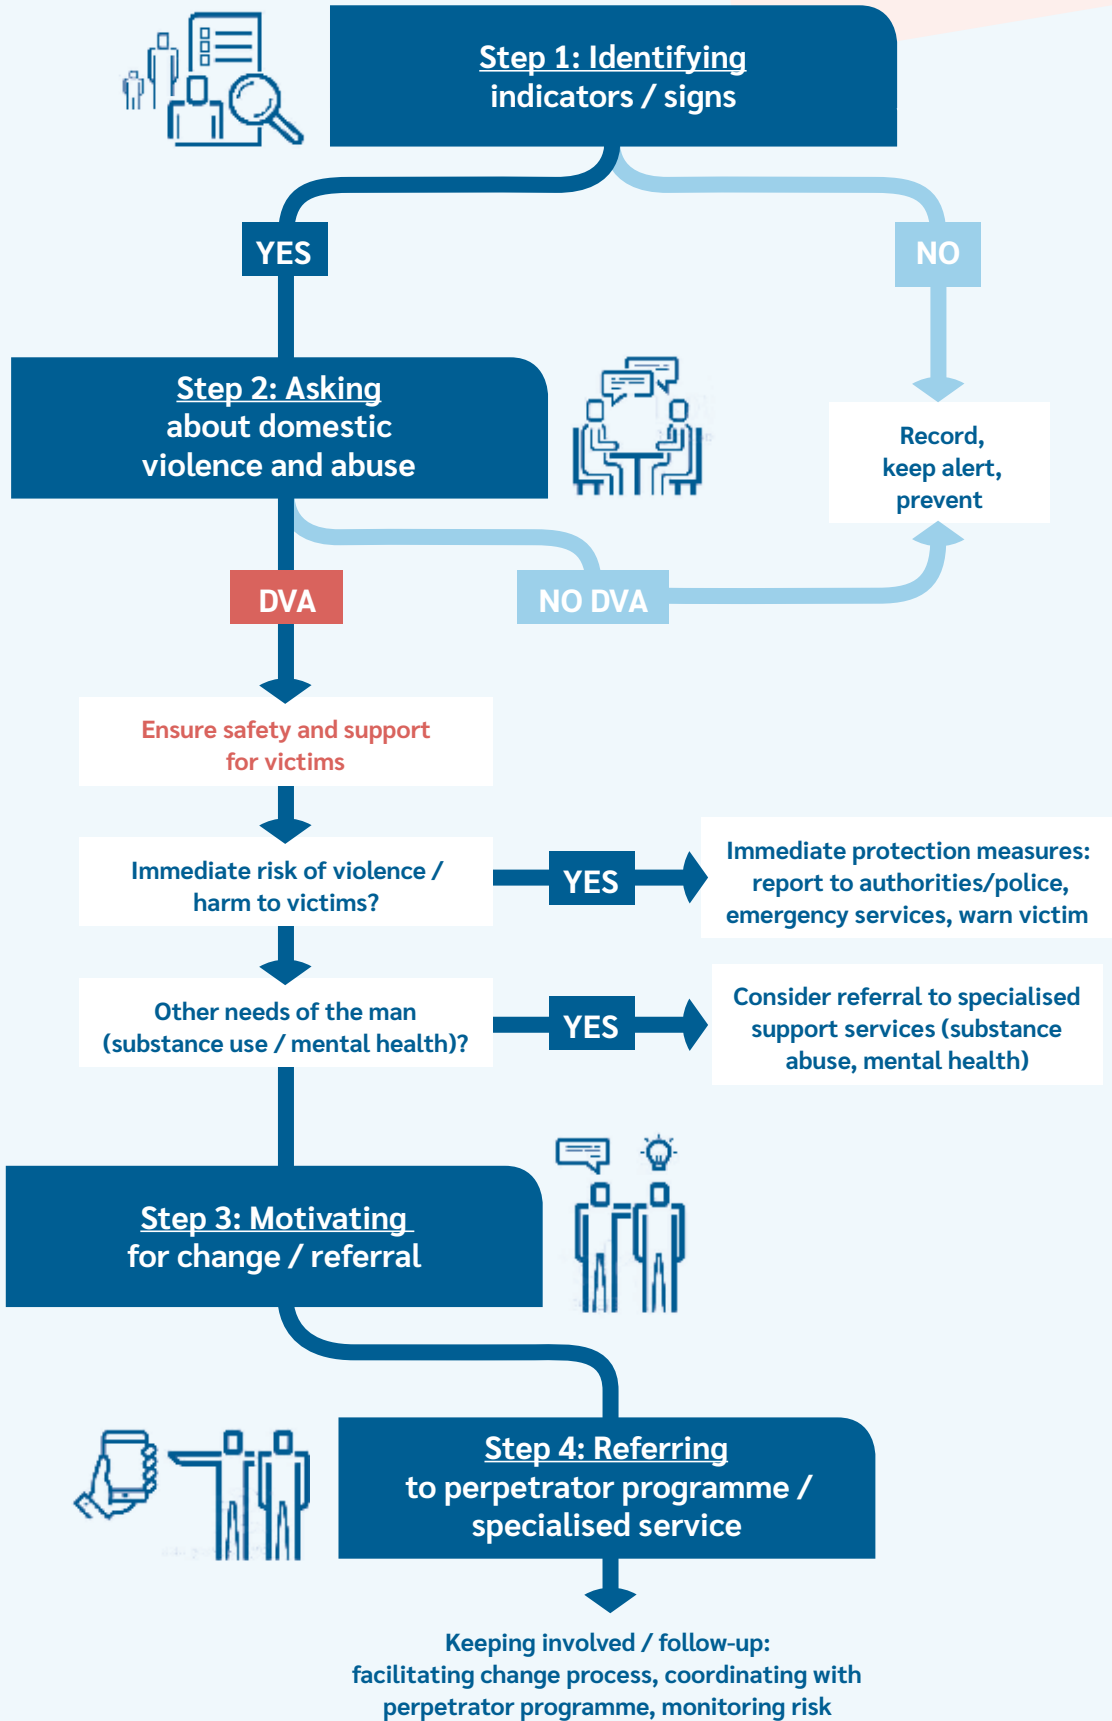

from: Guidelines for Working with Men Perpetrating Domestic Violence (Respect Phonenumber, 2013)

Notes

Lined area for notes with horizontal blue lines.

engage Roadmap: 4 Steps

The safety and rights of the victims / survivors are the priority in all our interventions!

Record the man's disclosures and your observations, interventions and referrals / coordination in the case file.

